BROUGHT TO YOU BY DALLAS SAFARI CLUB

STAYING RELEVANT

We need to convey a clearer message about hunting's benefits to the nonhunting community.

he desire to understand our place in nature is an ancient human preoccupation, arising long before our earliest recognized civilizations. Indeed, the emphasis given to this by and most successful social enterprise by far, gave rise to the extraordinary world of myth and ritual that are among the great hallmarks of our humanity. In this sense, it can be argued that modern art and religion were born in a womb of uncertainty, an intense and shadowed place where man's sense of uniqueness conflicted with his inescapable dependence upon the wild others he pursued and killed. It would appear little has changed, and modern debates over our dual citizenship, as both nature's consumers and custodians all, are unlikely to go away anytime soon.

In this conceptual struggle, hunting has emerged as one of the most contentious issues of all. Why in the modern world, it is asked, should the wilful pursuit and taking of wild creatures be allowed? Obviously, for many people, experiences with wildlife can include the stalking and voyeuristic capture of the animal, visually or with camera, but not extend to predatory engagement. Many individuals thus condemn hunting as an anachronism and unnecessary cruelty. By focusing on the animal's death, they come to condemn the hunting process that leads to it. While it may be convenient for hunters to condemn such ideas outright, or ascribe them to a fringe "animal rights crowd," the reality is that many people who hold such oppositional views towards hunting are neither fringe elements nor animal rights activists.

They simply don't see any societal value in hunting, and therefore see the pain and death of wild creatures that result as unnecessary and unacceptable.

Many of these individuals care deephunter-gatherer societies, our longest ly about wildlife and conservation. In this sense, they rightfully deserve both our respect and willingness to explain. They are, after all, on our side—although not on the same team. If they are led to honestly ask us, "Why do you hunt?" and "What relevance does hunting have today?" then I believe, as hunters, we have a responsibility to answer truthfully. But this, it appears, is not such an easy task. Most often hunters respond to the question of "why" by explaining some of the benefits they personally derive while hunting, rather than the deeply personal motivations that lead them to pursue it. Thus they will cite time outdoors, or the exercise benefits, or the opportunity to spend time with friends and family as the reasons for their hunting activities-to which the opponents of hunting respond, but why do these things need to end in the death of a beautiful creature? Can you not derive these pleasantries without killing things? The truthful answer, of course, is we can, and often do.

These perspectives obviously frustrate hunters, believing as we do that our engagements with wild animals lead us to become elite advocates for their conservation and protection. We see the economic and political support that hunters have so long provided as critical to wildlife. We further point out that under many circumstances hunting can help reduce negative wildlife impacts that can undermine crucial public support for this resource. We point to animal diseases, threats to human property and safety, and habitat destruction or alteration as just some of the negative impacts that unrestrained wildlife populations, native or invasive, can inflict on society.

Guaranteed Tags for Bighorn, Moose and Late Season Elk! Call for more information.

Safari C 00 Bighorns FNAWS 2002 Golata Award Winner Outfitter of the 1986-2002 Outstanding Outfitter of the Year Year Award

> B. Joe, Lori, Jozie & Jessie Coy Box 3055 • Cody, WY 82414 • Outfitters License #185 (307) 587-6944 • Fax: (307) 587-9072 e-mail: bjoe@cowboystate.net website: coysyellowcreek.net

The reasons we hunt go far beyond enjoying the outdoors or spending time with friends. The deeply personal motivations that lead us afield and the sense of connection with our quarry are much more difficult concepts to put into words.

Now Booking

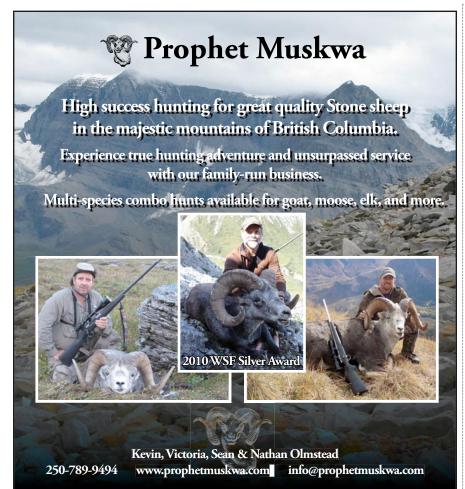

Summer trips available as well

Hunting < 120,000 acre Private Ranch for Deer and Antelope

CONSERVATION CORNER wITH SHANE MAHONEY

S BROUGHT TO YOU BY Dallas Safari Club

Applying for Special Permits? USE H.A.S. MONEY! Altimus Adventures Guide Service*Licensed in 9 states

Specializing in Fair Chase Trophy Hunting

ew Mexico Orvx- 40"but

For states requiring up-front money H.A.S. will issue a guaranteed check using H.A.S. funds, recommend areas, complete your application, and submit to state game agencies. When up-front money is not required H.A.S. will complete your application for a minimal fee of $50.

Join H.A.S. today and take advantage of the knowledge and expertise of people for whom hunting is a way of life, not just a way to make a living. Let H.A.S. do everything possible to help you draw that tag of a lifetime!

PO Box 552

Pearce, AZ 85625

ph/fax: 520-826-1032 altimus@vtc.net

HUNTER APPLICATION SERVICE Established 1997 Larry L. and Stephanie Altimus

Toll Free: 1-888-824-7748 www.hunterapplicationservice.com Hunting, we argue, can help deal with these issues, at no cost to the taxpayer. So, doesn't everybody win? And if hunters don't do this, who will?

This is all true, at least in part. Unfortunately for hunting, there are also many exceptions to these arguments. In fact, we hunt only a tiny percentage of the wildlife species in North America. Most animal populations rise and fall with no influence from hunting whatsoever, and relatively few examples of hunting effectively regulating animal populations can actually be found. Furthermore, many hunted species have reached incredible numbers, far beyond what hunting can reasonably control. Certainly it is true that hunters, through license sales and tax levies, do fund an incredible array of conservation programs, supporting game and non-game species management and research, and purchasing extensive amounts of habitat for biodiversity in general. However, considerable public funding from general revenues is also applied to wildlife conservation in North America, often far more than hunters are aware of or will acknowledge. Yet, there can be no doubt, that, per capita, hunters pay the greatest freight, and this fact we emphasize too little.

So where does this leave us? It leaves us in desperate need of a more fundamental debate and dialogue on the issues of why we hunt and the relevance of hunting in modern times. It may be fashionable or convenient to reduce arguments in favor of hunting to simplistic categories or half-truths, but in the end these arguments will fail us where it matters most; in the fight for the hearts of the public majority who still support hunting, for the support of those who may be opposed but are truly open-minded, and for our own lifelong commitments to our greatest engagement with nature. In support of hunting, we need strong, clear arguments, based on real evidence and delivered with enlightened passion. What organization will rise to lead this charge, I wonder?

Breaking Records at the 2010 DSC Convention

The benchmarks of success have never been loftier. The recent Dallas Safari Club/Sports Afield 2010 hunting convention concluded with several confirmed and pending new records for expo exhibits, total attendance, gate revenue, auction proceeds, all of which translates to record funding for the DSC mission in the coming year.

"We blew the doors off some previous records, most notably our fundraising totals for conservation and education projects worldwide," said Ben Carter, executive director of DSC. "The economy may be down but it didn't appear so at our convention."

Expo traffic was heavy for much of the show. Hans Vermaak of South Africa's Coenraad Vermaak Safaris, the longest-operating safari outfit in Africa, said, "People who have money are still booking safaris and buying a lot of things, which is great. It's almost as though they're buying even more safaris right now because there are so many deals to be had."

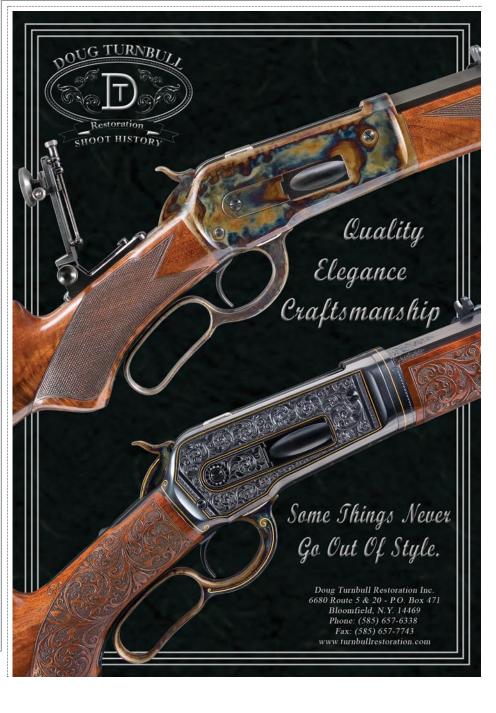

Anso Thormahlen of Thormahlen and Cochran Safaris echoed, "We had a very good show after traffic picked up on the first day. We booked several safaris and, as always, thank DSC for the opportunity to be here."

The convention was at the Dallas Convention Center for the first time. "This was our first year in a big, new facility that gave us room to grow and I couldn't be more pleased with the end result. We'll be at the Dallas Convention Center at least through 2015 so there's also room to grow our event experience and proficiency in our new home. I expect our show to get better and better," said Carter.

Carter added that the DSC event will continue to be the first major sporting expo each year, annually offering hunters their first opportunity to shop and book dates with top outfitters.

Among the distinguished guests at the convention were: Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas; Actress Anne Lockhart; NRA Executive Vice President and CEO Wayne LaPierre; Actor Gerald McRaney; Congressman Pete Sessions, Texas; Sgt. 1st Class Greg Stube; Actor Marshall Teague; Gen. Chuck Yeager; Congressman Don Young, Alaska.

Awards were presented to a number of DSC members, recognizing them for outstanding commitment to hunting and the outdoors. Award of Excellence: Frank Sweeney; Colin Caruthers Young Hunter Award: Chase Phillips; J.J. Malek South Pacific Grand Slam Award: Craig Boddington; Outfitter of the Year Award: Peter Thormahlen of Thormahlen and Cochran Safaris; Outstanding Hunting Achievement Award: Tom Montgomery; Peter Hathaway Capstick Hunting Heritage Award: Hubert Thummler; Sporting Heritage Award of Excellence from Sporting Classics: Dallas Safari Club.—DSC

DSC convention highlights, by the numbers:

$400,000: Gain in auction proceeds over 2009 (estimate, pending new record).

300,000: Square feet of exhibit space (new record).$40,000: Top bid for an elephant hunt with African outfitter Coenraad Vermaak Safaris.

$40,000: Top bid for an Arizona commissioner's elk tag. 30,800: Attendance based on sales of day passes. 1,100: Show exhibits (new record).